One of the most remarkable systems of water supply in the world is to be found in Galveston, Tex. About a mile north of the city is a valley a thousand feet wide, which surveyors determine to be the location of an underground stream, though the valley itself was dry this stream and give the city a pure supply of water. The city engineer, a young man from the East, suggested that, in lieu of a reservoir, the hidden stream be dammed, when there would at all times be an inexhaustible supply. He was derided, but firm in the belief that his theory was right, he obtained an appropriation for an experimental

Sinking a large one in the centre of the valley, he struck living water at the depth of 30 feet, coming in such quantities that a powerful steam pump could not lower it to any perceptible degree. An appropriation enabled him to earry out his plans, which resulted in obtaining an unlimited quantity of covered the entire width of the stream. He next tunneled from well to well, making a six-foot excavation the entire distance across the stream. This was enlarged so as to be six feet high and eight feet wide. Then on the lower side he built a substantial stone dam six feet high, its foundation being below the bed of the submerged stream, which was clearly defined. The water collected so fast that the central section had to be left until the two wings were completed. When this was done, work was begun on the central unfinished leading into the city, the tunnel was filled with water, and a current flowing over the dam was observed at all five of the wells. The mains were filled as soon as the pumps could be set at work, and, although no limit has ever been placed upon the use of the water, the supply has never at any time been lowered below the top of the dam. In rainy weather and in dry weather the volume of water has remained the same. It is free from all vegetable or mineral impurities, and is cold and
